Wallowa County is very diverse geologically and ecologically. Wallowa County’s elevation spans from 900ft on the Snake River to almost 9,900ft at peaks of the Wallowa Mountains. The Wallowa Mountains, which were part of a large island arc, slammed into the North American continent over 100 million years ago. The mountains contain marble, limestone and fossil-laden shale rock outcroppings, and today support alpine and sub alpine ecosystems. Hells Canyon, Wallowa County’s eastern border, is the deepest canyon in North America. It contains hundreds of basalt flows and formations, not to mention the limestone outcrops! This canyon also contains desert, subalpine, alpine, and prairie ecosystems. Zumwalt Prairie is the largest in-tact prairie system in the western United States, and is a haven for raptor and songbird species. The northern part of Wallowa County contains the eastern segment of the Blue Mountains, and desert, subalpine, prairie, and even pockets of plant communities that can be classified as rainforest. The diversity of Wallowa County has created a diverse habitat for wildlife species. Much of Wallowa County contains working lands with stewards and land owners working hard to conserve the natural dynamics of this beautiful landscape, while also continuing the lifestyle and business for the next generation.
